The simple answer is that you are asking the question wrong. In language, the central and more important way to influence words is always what you could define as ā ā ā ā ā ā ā ā ā ā ā ĩ ∞ ĳ Ą ē The models that occur more frequently and are more flexible and applicable to most roots. In English, the regular pluralization model is the addition of /z/ (with some rules of assimilation and epenthesis). Everything else is irregular, including mice /mice and lice /lice. So really, it makes more sense to ask why there are not mice and lice /lce. If we look at it from a slightly more abstract angle and we wonder why these three words identical to the singular (except for initial consonant) are different to the plural, we can respond more usefully. Let's start with the houses. The reason why the house plural is homes is that the fine is the regular model.¹ This is simple. In the early stages of English, House had several plural; But it was regularized to adapt to the most elementary scheme of the addition of /Z/. If we go back to Old English, the word was hA Å s (pronounced /Hua Å s/, like A Å Ć Ā Ĥ;hoostwā in Modern English), and also the plural was hA Å w s. Mouse and lice were similarly more i /muÅ å s / o lA Å w s / luÅ
