Term for allopathic medicine of modern, science-based medicine, or allopathy, is an archaic term used to define modern science-based medicine. [1] [2] There are regional variations in the use of the term. In the United States, the term is used to contrast with osteopathic medicine, especially in the field of medical education. The terms were coined in 1810 by the inventor of homeopathy, Samuel Hahnemann. [3] It was originally used by 19th century homeopaths as a derogatory term for heroic medicine, the traditional European medicine of the time and a precursor of modern medicine, which did not rely on proof of efficacy. Heroic medicine was based on the belief that the disease is caused by an imbalance between the four "huori" (blood, phlegm, yellow bile and black bile) and tried to treat the symptoms of the disease by correcting this imbalance, using "hard and abusive" methods. treat their underlying causes: the disease was caused by an excess of a humor and thus would be treated with its "opposite." [5] Among homeopaths and other advocates of alternative medicine, "allopathic medicine" now refers to "the broad category of medical practice which is sometimes called Western medicine, biomedicine, evidence-based medicine, or modern medicine." [6] This description continued to be used to describe everything that was not homeopathy. [5] The implied meaning of the label has never been accepted by conventional medicine and is still considered pejorative by some. [7] William Jarvis, an expert in alternative medicine and public health, [8] states that "although many modern therapies can be interpreted to conform to an allopathic logic (e.g. using a laxative to relieve constipation), standard medicine has never paid fidelity to an allopathic Principle "And that the label" considered allopathic "was" [9] The most modern science-based medical treatments (antibiotics, vaccines and chemotherapeutics, for example) do not fit Samuel Hahnemann's definition of Allopathy, as they try to prevent disease, or alleviate a disease by eliminating its cause. [10] [11] Etymology The terms "allopathic medicine" and "allopathy" are taken from the Greek prefix Ἀ14 "Ã@Ã" Ἀ@ Ã2Ã, ÃÃillos", other ""', "+" the suffix ι_ç", Î, PÃthos, "sufference". History The practice of medicine in Europe and North America during the early 19th century is sometimes referred to as heroic medicine due to extreme measures (such as blood) bloodEmployee in an attempt to treat diseases. [12] The term allopathic was used by Hahnemann and other homeopaths in advance to highlight the difference they perceived between homeopathy and heroic "conventional" medicine of their time. With the term allopathy (which means "different from the disease"), Hahnemann intended to emphasize how doctors with conventional training used therapeutic approaches that, at warning of him, simply treated symptoms and failed to deal with the disharmony produced by the underlying disease . [Clarification necessary] Homeopaths have seen such symptomatic treatments as "opposites dealing with opposites" and believed that these methods were harmful to patients [3]. Alternative medicine professionals used the term "allopathic medicine" to refer to the practice of conventional medicine both in Europe and in the United States since the nineteenth century. In that century, the term allopathic has been used more often as a derogatory name for practitioners of heroic medicine, [13] [14] A precursor of modern medicine who can't convince the proof of effectiveness. James Whorton discusses this harsing historical use: a form of verbal war used in irregular retaliation was the word 'allopathy'. ... "Allopathy" and "Allopathy" were used freely as worse by all the irregular doctors of the nineteenth century, and the terms were considered highly offensive by those to which they were directed. The acceptance generally not included of the [term] "Allopathic medicine" by doctors today is an indication both the lack of awareness of the historical use of the term and the recent thawing of the relations between irregular and allopathe. [15] The controversy that surrounds the term can be traced back to its original use during a heated 15th century debate among the professionals of homeopathy and those regenerated in a derivative way as "allopathic". [16] Hahnemann used "allopathy" to refer to what he saw as a medical system that fights the disease using remedies that produce effects in a different healthy subject (therefore to the Greek root "different") from the effects produced by the disease to be treated. The distinction derives from the use in homeopathy of substances that are intended to cause similar effects such as symptoms of a disease to treat patients (homeo - similar meaning). As used by homeopaths, the term allopathy has always referred to the principle of treatment of diseases by administering substances that produce other symptoms (when they are supplied to a healthy human) compared to the symptoms produced by a disease. For example, part of an allopathic fever treatment can include the use of a drug that reduces fever, including a drug (such as an antibiotic) that attacks the cause of fever (as a bacterial infection). A homeopathic treatment The fever, on the contrary, is the one that uses a diluted dosage of a substance that in a non-diluted form induced fever in a healthy person. These preparations are typically diluted so strongly that not contain any actual molecules of the original substance. hahnemann oð this term to distinguish the medicine of his time from the use of infinitesimally small (or non-existent) doses of substances to treat the spiritual causes of the disease. the companion encyclopedia of the history of medicine states that "[Hahnemann] gave an all-inclusive name to regular practice, calling it 'allopathy'. This term, however unpredictable, was oated by its followers and other unorthodox movements to identify the prevailing methods as nothing but a "school" of competing medicine, however dominant by number of practitioners and patients"[17]. Contrary to current use, hahnemann reserved the term "allopathic medicine" to the practice of treating diseases with drugs that induce non-related symptoms (i.e. not similar or opposite) to those of the disease. he defined the practice of treating diseases with drugs that produce opposite symptoms to those of the patient «enantiopathic» (from the Greek ἀ14/121/211/212/21 (enÃntios), which means «opposed») or «antiopathic medicine». [18] after the death of hahnemann, the term «enatiopathy» fell into disuse and the two concepts of allopathy and more enantiopathy. Both, however, indicate what hahnemann thought of his medical practices rather than the ideas of the present. conventional doctors of the xix century had never speculated that the therapeutic effects of drugs were necessarily related to the symptoms they caused in healthy subjects (for example, in 1747 james lind systematically tested several substances and common foods for their effect in the treatment of scurvy and discovered that lemon juice was particularly effective.) did not conduct studies of these substances on healthy volunteers.) allopathic (which confers the title of md) and osteopathic (which confers the title of DO).[20] The use of the term remains common among homeopaths and has spread to other alternative medical practices. the meaning of the label has never been accepted by conventional medicine and is still considered worse by some[7]. William jarvis, an expert in alternative medicine and public health,[8] states that "although many modern therapies can be interpreted as conforming to a allopathic logic (for example, the use of a laxative to alleviate constipation.) traditional medicine has never adhered to a allopathic principle" and that the label "allopathic" has been "considered highly derisive by medicine".[9]The disease or eliminating the cause of a disease by acting on the cause of the disease.
