Multiple sclerosis is a debilitating disease of the central nervous system that mainly affects the brain and spinal cord. The immune system of a patient with multiple sclerosis attacks myelin, which is the protective sheath surrounding the nerve fibers. When the myelinic sheath gets damaged, the nerves are unable to communicate effectively between the brain and the rest of the body. Symptoms of multiple sclerosis are different for each patient and depend on the degree of nerve damage. Furthermore, symptoms vary depending on which nerves are affected. Some individuals with multiple sclerosis can go through long periods of remission with the absence of new symptoms, while others may lose their ability to walk alone or completely. There is no known cure for multiple sclerosis, but treatment can change the course of the disease, manage symptoms, and speed up recovery from attacks. This attack still does not guarantee the diagnosis of multiple sclerosis because individuals who have a clinically isolated syndrome sometimes do not go to develop multiple sclerosis. This first episode of neurological symptoms must last at least twenty-four hours and is accompanied by brain injuries that can be seen on a magnetic resonance. Brain lesions may be similar to injuries occurring in multiple sclerosis or may be dissimilar from them. The presence of similar injuries indicates that the patient will have a second episode of symptoms and a subsequent diagnosis of relapsed multiple sclerosis. When magnetic resonance lesions are absent or dissimilar from multiple sclerosis, the individual has a much lower probability of developing multiple sclerosis. It has been shown that treating clinically isolated syndrome early helps to delay the occurrence of more severe types of multiple sclerosis.
