Multimedia Platforms Design Team See that thing over there? You probably noticed them around, mostly on advertising. It's called QR code, and marketers want you to use your smartphone's camera to read it. That's what you should know about them... and how to do your own! QR codes (Quick Response) are a type of barcode, not unlike those vertically lined on each product you purchase, which provide information when read by a scanner equipped to interpret it. They were first used in the mid-1990s by a Japanese car manufacturer as a way to track parts, but marketers started using them as a fun way to codify and share more information with consumers, as well as what they can squeeze into an ad. (Here shown is Good Housekeeping's.) After downloading an app (I like QuickMark, but there are a lot of options out there), you use the camera of your smartphone to capture the code. You will be promptly asked if you want to see any information indicates the code — it may be a prompt to go to a URL of the website or to send an email (for example, to enter a contest). Marketers also use them to offer discounts and coupons — a reason that really pays to look for these ads. In addition, technology-experienced companies are putting them on employee business cards, so that contact information can be quickly read and imported into the address book. To create your own, you can use a phone app (QuickMark does this), or go to a QR generator website, such as QRStuff.com or Qurify.com. Some ideas for what you could codify: contact information, your Facebook profile URL page, or even a Google map of your home (for aof party, for example). Once created, you can save the square code as an image file that you can share or paste anywhere you see fit, or you can email it or send it to your friends and family (the phone apps can also interpret the codes sent in this way). QR code upgrades QR codes are customizable with designs based on company marketing strategies using codes. Some offer opt-in options for text messages, emails or or calls to access more info. You automatically text, email or call a number through the QR code once you authorize it to do so. This lets you subscribe to a distribution list for future updates. Types of QR Codes There are several types of Quick Response codes for different purposes. A vCard code allows you to add the business as a contact in your address book. These are often used on business cards. The website URL codes direct you to a web address. This could be on an ad for a movie. When you go to the website, you'll likely find locations, dates, times and a trailer to preview the movie. An event code is another type. It adds an event to your calendar. Map codes give you an address and directions to a location. MORE FROM QUESTIONSANSWERED.NET The walkera QR X350 Pro is a ready to fly quadcopter with a 25min flight time. If you are a stupid barcode-scanning, the QR code to the left links to my personal website. Fun! A QR "(Quick Response)" Code is a square bar code that makes URL, position coordinates, any text or contact information on a fast phone. With a scanner app for installed bar codes, just point the phone camera to the code to read its content. Here's how the reading of this QR code looks like on my Android phone, using an app simply called "barcode scanner". To find a scanner application, Google "QR Reader" and the phone model. (If you have a favorite scanner app you are using, let us know in the comments.) The coding of a regular url is an excellent use of QR & € codes "In particular long and complicated URL on movie flyers and events & € "But one of my favorite QR codes are exchanging mobile app recommendations with your friends. Since it is not possible to search for the Android market on the web or in the desktop software, you are always blocked by touching in terms of hand researching. The Referrer app generates QR codes for each application. So if you want to give that app to a friend, call the QR code and your friend can scan your phone screen. You will also see the QR codes on the web pages, in the window shop, on business cards and on the lectures for conferences. It is possible to generate your QR code with the information you want to be able to read their phones quickly too much. This QR code generator can incorporate a URL, a text, a telephone number, or an SMS message addressed and ready to send in a QR code.
