When you've got a potential customer on the hook, you need to act immediately. That's what prompted call-automation technology company TuVox to invest in a new site-visitor tracking service two years ago. The service it uses from VisiStat allows the TuVox sales team to view visitor activity on its website in real time, rather than having to comb through log reports 24 hours later for nuggets of information. It alerts users to activity by sending out an e-mail whenever someone visits designated pages—sort of like the bell ringing on the front door of a retail establishment. It's a fair question for Marshall Herskovitz and Ed Zwick, the Emmy-winning writing-producing-directing team: Why are two fiftysomethings the guys who brought us the '80s TV series Thirtysomething—creating and bankrolling a social network and an online TV program aimed at twentysomethings? Back in 2004, Herskovitz and Zwick made a pilot for a series then called Life for ABC. The network passed. Last year, the pair talked to ABC again about reworking the show but couldn't agree on its direction. So Herskovitz and Zwick went to their agents at Creative Artists Agency for help plotting a strategy to resuscitate the project online, as Quarterlife. The outcome? The producers are breaking the cardinal rule of Hollywood: They're financing the experiment themselves. Quarterlife debuted on MySpaceTV on November 11 with the first of 36 eight-minute episodes. The show purports to be of 7TV quality (read: expensive to produce) and centers on Dylan, a young woman who keeps a video blog (itself called Quarterlife) about her travails in life and love. Herskovitz and Zwick will split advertising revenue 50-50 with MySpace, which is getting the content for free. (The series will also be shown on Quarterlife.com, and Herskovitz and Zwick will keep all ad revenue from that stream.) "We're spending a lot more than we necessarily know we're going to be able to recoup," Zwick says, declining to be more specific. "Will advertisers be willing to support that? It's a big gamble." If a Web series were all the duo was up to, little would distinguish them from other creative folks—Seth MacFarlane (Family Guy) and Matt Stone and Trey Parker (South Park), to name a few—who have recently forged deals to take their content to the Web. But Herskovitz and Zwick see their new venture as a jumping-off point for something larger: a Web community that encourages members to display their creativity. The hope is that fans of the fictional Quarterlife series will visit Quarterlife.com and decide to stay. Will Quarterlife.com succeed in stealing users from Facebook and its own partner, MySpace? If it does, it will join a growing field of niche networks (such as Eons.com for baby boomers) that are trying to chip away at the behemoths. "The great myth about most social networks is that they're communities," says venture capitalist Paul Kedrosky, who writes the blog Infectious Greed. "Everybody on them has nothing in common other than being on them." Zwick knows that some will question whether a site created by guys in their third quarter of life will appeal to an audience just entering its second. "But we were in our forties when we did My So-Called Life," he says of their series on teens. "How old was Salinger when he wrote about Holden Caulfield?" After having successfully lobbied for an injunction against five torrenting and streaming sites back in December 2016, Foxtel (who has recently revealed its own horse in the streaming race, Foxtel Now) has since added dozens more sites to its list of claimed infringers. Some of these sites have since been blocked by the Federal Court, while others are still pending review. Now, the pay TV company is taking aim at an even bigger swathe of sites, targeting another 128 domains linked to piracy. The initial case was brought to the Australian Federal Court by Roadshow Films, Foxtel, Disney, Paramount, Columbia, and 20th Century Fox, and resulted in the court-ordered injunction for all major Australian ISPs to block access to five prominent piracy sites - specifically The Pirate Bay, Torrentz, TorrentHound, IsoHunt, and SolarMovie. Since that landmark decision, these rightsholders have both individually and collectively targeted a number of further websites and their related domains and mirror sites. Most recently, Foxtel filed an injunction in May 2017 that is the case they presented on Tuesday, August 8. While the rightsholders involved in said cases have pressed for a rolling injunction which would allow them to somewhat effortlessly add domains to the list of blocked sites, this motion hasn't been granted by the Court, meaning that each case must still be presented individually. What's the damage? The timing of this most recent court hearing lines up quite neatly with Foxtel's airing of the latest season of Game of Thrones, a show the presiding judge Justice Burley confesses to be a fan of. This could explain why a good portion of the 128 targeted domains are streaming sites rather than torrent networks, reflecting the broader shift in preference for how pirates are watching movie and TV content. Below is a list of the key affected domains courtesy of ComputerWorld (opens in new tab): YesMovies, Vumoo, LosMovies, CartoonHD, Putlocker, Watch Series 1, Watch Series 2, Project Free TV 1, Project Free TV 2, Watch Episodes, Watch Episode Series, Watch TV Series, The Dare Telly, Putlocker9.is, Putlocker9.to, Torlock and 1337x. Justice Burley has described the process of hunting down and blocking websites with all their affiliated mirrors and proxies as something like "whack-a-mole", referring to the apparently futile attempts to squash the ever-multiplying piracy sites.
