Could someone please advise me whether inventories or inventory is correct in the context below: We give you access to our secret pricing for unsold inventories in hundreds of thousands of hotels from around the worldThanks in Advance I would use "inventory" for the same reason I would use "milk." It doesn't really matter how many hotels this worldwide inventory comes from. (That's a personal opinion.)But if someone else used "inventories," it wouldn't concern me much. I would just keep reading. Could someone please advise me whether inventories or inventory is correct in the context below: We give you access to our secret pricing for unsold inventories in hundreds of thousands of hotels from around the worldThanks in Advance Are you writing this yourself? I am not sure what inventory is meant to denote here. One hotel has an inventory of unsold rooms. I wanted to say that I can access multiple such inventories. A bunch of unsold inventory becomes "unsold inventories" That sounds a reasonable use of a plural. In my extensive travel experience, "inventory," referring to unoccupied hotel rooms, is travel-industry jargon, unlikely to be understood by the general public.If you're writing advertising aimed at the general traveling public, I suggest you find a different expression.
